

1 Wonder, Love, and Praise
2 3 Sharing a Vision of the Church
4

5
6
7 Preface

8 The United Methodist Committee on Faith and Order was established by General 9 Conference action in 2008 as “a visible expression of the commitment of The United Methodist 10 Church to carry on informed theological reflection for the current time in dynamic continuity 11 with the historic Christian faith, our common heritage as Christians grounded in the apostolic 12 witness, and our distinctive Wesleyan heritage.” Among its responsibilities is “to prepare and 13 provide resources and study materials to the General Church upon request from the General 14 Conference, Council of Bishops, or Connectional Table.”<sup>1</sup>

15 No sooner was the committee organized than it received a request from the Council of 16 Bishops to prepare a new theological study document on ecclesiology—that is, on a theological 17 understanding of the church itself. The present document is submitted in response to that request.
18 It is intended to assist all of us in The United Methodist Church in gaining a clearer, more 19 comprehensive vision of the reality of the church, and to place our life and work as United 20 Methodists within the context of that vision. It engages with our Wesleyan heritage, with the 21 common Christian tradition rooted in the scriptural witness, and with the contemporary 22 ecumenical discussion.

23 It is the hope of our committee that, after a period of study, conversation, and reflection 24 leading to whatever corrections and other improvements might be found needful, this present

---

<sup>1</sup> The Book of Discipline of The United Methodist Church 2008 (Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 2008), p. 681 (§1908).

25 document might take a place alongside such official theological statements of the church as By 26 Water and the Spirit and This Holy Mystery. These documents have set a good precedent in 27 relating United Methodist teaching to the growing ecumenical convergence on the topics with 28 which they deal—respectively, Baptism and Holy Communion—and we have aimed for a 29 similar constructive synthesis here.

30

31

Introduction

32 United Methodists are in need of a renewed vision today: not just a new view—which 33 might be just the latest rationale for the latest operational program—but a renewed capacity to 34 see and apprehend what “church” is all about. With our fellow Christians everywhere, we 35 witness a rapidly changing church, both within our denomination and within the larger Christian 36 movement around the world. Migration, immigration, and the push and pull of globalizing forces 37 are reconfiguring the face of Christianity, as well as the larger religious make-up of the human 38 family. Old customs and certainties are being challenged and a yet-unclear future beckons.
39 United Methodists, too, wish to enter into that future with joy, resilience, grace, and hope.

40 Yet, many factors seem to be conspiring to create in us moods and dispositions of quite 41 another sort. In places where United Methodism finds itself numbered among mainline (or “old-42 line”) Protestant denominations, the “narrative of decline” has held us in its sway, often with 43 encouragement from adherents of avowedly rival forms of (or, in some cases, substitutes for) 44 Christianity—some of which may not in fact be in the best of health themselves. At the same 45 time, surveys indicate that a growing proportion of populations in some regions of former 46 Christian dominance claim no religious affiliation at all. Some identify themselves as “spiritual 47 but not religious,” while others are more secularist in orientation; but many in either of these 48 camps view the Christian churches in general as havens for prejudice, hypocrisy, and fear, which 49 have outlived whatever positive purpose they may once have had.<sup>2</sup> Growing awareness of 50 instances of sexual misconduct and other sorts of malfeasance on the part of pastors and other 51 church leaders across the denominational spectrum—and of the frequent complicity of church 52 authorities in facilitating, hiding, and excusing such conduct—has not enhanced public trust in 53 the institutional church.

54 To some extent, these are all issues for the church around the world; but in different parts 55 of the world—in Africa, the Americas, Asia, Europe, and Oceania—there are also distinctive 56 challenges linked to distinctive religious, political, and cultural contexts. Some of these have to 57 do with the civil government and polity of the country or region concerned, and the way that 58 churches or religions (or particular churches or religions) are regarded and treated by the state.
59 Some have to do with the religious history and religious demographics of the context, and with 60 the way the church is perceived against that background.

61 The dramatic recent growth of The United Methodist Church in parts of Africa and Asia, 62 and the increasing visibility and involvement of United Methodists from other countries in its 63 leadership, are gradually bringing United Methodists in the United States to a greater (if belated)
64 awareness that theirs is, if not a “global” or “worldwide” church, at least not simply an American 65 denomination. This reality brings a number of new factors into play. It challenges the adequacy 66 of a polity that has been essentially U.S.-centric, taking for granted a basic, normative national 67 identity for the denomination. It greatly expands the range of cultural differences to be found 68 within the church, and the range of issues that the church faces in carrying out its mission. At

---

<sup>2</sup> “‘Nones’ on the Rise: One-in-Five Adults Have No Religious Affiliation,” The Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, October 9, 2012, at <http://www.pewforum.org/2012/10/09/nones-on-the-rise/>.

69 these and other points, our common self-understanding as a church has lagged behind the pace of 70 change in our actual situation. Wherever we United Methodists find ourselves, we need fresh 71 vision, and a broadening of horizons.

72 It is a happy concurrence that, as our reflection as a Committee on Faith and Order got 73 underway, the broader Faith and Order movement—through the Faith and Order Commission of 74 the World Council of Churches—released its new long-awaited study, The Church: Towards a 75 Common Vision in 2013.<sup>3</sup> Like the earlier landmark ecumenical document, Baptism, Eucharist, 76 and Ministry (1982), this one aims to represent the extent to which long-separated Christian 77 communities are finding common ground in their understanding and practice.

78 Some may wonder why the appearance of The Church: Towards a Common Vision 79 should be viewed as a “happy concurrence.” Why should United Methodists engage this 80 ecumenical document in our own search for a renewed ecclesiological vision? What is at stake in 81 the conversation?

82 A response to these questions might begin with a reminder that the search for Christian 83 unity is misunderstood if it is taken to mean only a painstaking process of inter-church 84 diplomacy among experts aimed at reconciling the doctrines and polities of separate 85 denominations, important as that dedicated work may be. Even less is it an exercise in nostalgia, 86 trying to recover power, place, and prestige in society now long gone. At its heart, the search for 87 Christian unity is nothing other than a search for the reality of the church itself—and it is a
88 search in which all of us are involved. It is a prayerful quest to realize the unity for which Jesus

---

<sup>3</sup> Faith and Order Paper No. 214 (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2014), downloadable at <http://www.oikoumene.org/en/resources/documents/wcc-commissions/faith-and-order-commission/i-unity-the-church-and-its-mission/the-church-towards-a-common-vision>. It is also available there in French, German, Spanish, Korean, Finnish, and Italian versions.

89 prays when, in the gospel according to John, he asks the Father that those to whom “eternal life” 90 is given “may all be one . . . that they may be one, as we are one, I in them and you in me, that 91 they may become completely one . . .” (John 17:20-23 NRSV). Mission and unity are 92 inextricably connected. The recent ecumenical document Together towards Life aptly warns: 93 “The lack of full and real unity in mission still harms the authenticity and credibility of the 94 fulfillment of God’s mission in this world.”<sup>4</sup> At stake, then, in the search for Christian unity is 95 the integrity of the mission of the body of Christ as a whole. At stake, by implication, is the 96 integrity of our United Methodist mission as part of the church universal.

97         It would be unwise to act as if that unity were already fully known within each separate 98 “church,” so that the only remaining task is to bring them together. In a Christian movement now 99 present on all continents, taking form in hundreds of languages and cultures, we stand in 100 desperate need of new models for grasping and living—within this very diversity—the genuine 101 unity for which Jesus prayed.

102         It may be no accident that the “ecumenical winter” of recent years has seen not only a 103 cooling of interest in overcoming divisions among the churches, but also a troubling increase in 104 divisions within some churches, sometimes leading to new separations. The two may be closely 105 related. As we reflect on the ways we ourselves have dealt with our disagreements and with one 106 another in recent years in The United Methodist Church, we may have to confess that spirits 107 have been at work among us that are other than the Spirit of Christ. Our readiness at times to 108 label other members of the body as the agents of those alien spirits, rather than to examine our

---

<sup>4</sup> Together towards Life: Mission and Evangelism in Changing Landscapes—with a Practical Guide, edited by Jooseop Keum (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2013), p. 23; the text is available electronically at <http://www.oikoumene.org/en/resources/documents/commissions/mission-and-evangelism/together-towards-life-mission-and-evangelism-in-changing-landscapes>.

109 own hearts, is prima facie evidence of that fact. To engage in prayerful reflection upon the 110 nature and mission of the church, seeking to share a common vision, may therefore be a needful 111 exercise in repentance and reorientation, leading, we may hope, to newness of life. As Towards 112 a Common Vision reminds us, the unity we seek as Christians is a unity to be realized, not a unity 113 to be either assumed or imposed. It is a gift from God, and one that continually transforms those 114 who receive it.

115 Not surprisingly, the eminent Scottish missiologist Andrew Walls predicted that the great 116 issues facing the body of Christ in the twenty-first century will be ecumenical issues—namely, 117 how “African and Indian and Chinese and Korean and North American and European Christians 118 can together make real the life of the body of Christ.”<sup>5</sup> Thus, to ask “ecumenical” questions 119 about Christian unity-in-diversity is by the nature of the case to ask “missional” questions.
120 Indeed, such questions take us to the heart of the matter in our struggle as United Methodists to 121 discern our ecclesiological identity and witness today: How might United Methodists 122 characterize our particular role within the “Church Universal”? What is our niche in the ecclesial 123 ecology? What insights might our deep attention to the ecumenical discussion generate for 124 dealing more constructively and effectively with the vexing issues surrounding “legitimate 125 diversity,” both as they affect our own life and mission in The United Methodist Church and in 126 our ongoing relations with other Christian communities? How might a renewed vision of the 127 reality of the church help us toward a better ordering of our common life? How might it lead us 128 into more constructive relationships with persons of other religious faiths and traditions, as well 129 as with those who identify with none?

---

<sup>5</sup> Andrew F. Walls, “From Christendom to World Christianity,” in The Cross-Cultural Process in Christian History: Studies in the Transmission and Appropriation of Faith (Orbis, 2002), 69.

130           In confronting these questions, a conversation with The Church: Towards a Common 131 Vision has much to offer—and United Methodists would be wise to drink deeply from this 132 wisdom, as we have in the past. The fact that this ecumenical text is the product of a sustained 133 global effort involving Christians from many different traditions, cultures, and circumstances 134 may enable it to speak to our United Methodist situation in ways that will generate new 135 possibilities.

136           Given the participation of members of The United Methodist Church and its predecessor 137 bodies, along with members of other churches in the Methodist family, at every stage of the 138 crafting of The Church: Towards a Common Vision, we should not be surprised that the leading 139 themes and affirmations of this document resonate strongly with our own particular heritage. At 140 the same time, by grounding its account of the church in a vision that is often more implicit than 141 explicit in our own tradition, The Church: Towards a Common Vision may assist us in bringing 142 our ecclesiology to more coherent expression. As United Methodists, we have a considerable 143 store of affirmations concerning the church, drawn from resources throughout the broader 144 Christian tradition and found in our hymnody and liturgy as well as in official statements of 145 doctrine and polity. However, these affirmations and references tend to remain scattered and 146 isolated from one another.<sup>6</sup> Our ongoing encounter with a wide range of ecumenical partners is 147 leading us to a deeper and more empowering understanding both of what we have in common 148 and of our distinctive vocation as “part of the Church Universal.” For all these reasons, The

---

<sup>6</sup> A resource paper of the Committee on Faith and Order prepared by Russell E. Richey has gathered and organized many of these references, showing their range and value as resources for contemporary thinking: United Methodist Doctrine and Teaching On the Nature, Mission, and Faithfulness of the Church, available at http://www.gbhem.org/sites/default/files/documents/publications/DOM\_Nature\_Mission\_Faithfulness\_of\_Church.pdf.

149 Church: Towards a Common Vision will be an important conversation partner in our effort to 150 formulate a United Methodist ecclesial vision in the pages that follow.

151

152 I. Our Approach to an Understanding of the Church

153 The communities of Christian faith that came together in 1968 to create The United 154 Methodist Church shared some distinctive convictions that, insofar as it is true to its origins, 155 continue to energize and guide its life and witness. Among these are the convictions that the 156 saving love of God is meant for all people, not just for a favored few; that it is a transformative 157 love; and that it is a community-creating love.

158 The saving love of God is meant for all people: “God our Savior . . . desires everyone to 159 be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Timothy 2:4). John Wesley’s comment 160 on this statement in his Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament emphasizes the “everyone”: 161 all of humankind is included in this desire—“Not a part only, much less the smallest part.” He 162 also notes another implication of the statement: “They are not compelled.”<sup>7</sup> The grace of God 163 extended to all does not override human freedom, but activates it, so that our salvation, while 164 entirely a gift, involves our free participation. These two points about the universality of God’s 165 saving love are repeated throughout his writing and embodied in his ministry. They were 166 essential to Wesley’s understanding of the gospel, and to the power of the movement he inspired.
167 They remain a vital part of United Methodist affirmation.

168 The saving love of God is transformative: To use the language familiar to Wesley and his 169 contemporaries, as God’s grace is accepted in faith, it brings both “justification,” the restoration 170 of a right relationship with God, and “sanctification,” the renewal of our very being. There is a

---

<sup>7</sup> John Wesley, Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament (London: The Epworth Press, 1950), p. 775.

171 new birth. The love of God for us becomes the love of God in us. In the words of the apostle 172 Paul, “For freedom Christ has set us free” (Galatians 5:1), and being “called to freedom,” we are 173 to “live by the Spirit,” which means living by the love of God that empowers us to put aside “the 174 works of the flesh” and to bear “the fruit of the Spirit . . . love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, 175 generosity, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control” (Galatians 5:13,16,19,22). A hallmark of 176 John Wesley’s preaching, and of the preaching and testimony of the people called Methodist 177 through the years, is that such an experienced, here-and-now transformation of human life by the 178 power of the Holy Spirit is real.

179         The saving love of God creates community: The transformation just described is by its 180 very nature a transformation of our relationships with others. It is through others that we 181 experience the love of God; it is with others that the pattern of new life that God gives is both 182 learned and lived out. Much of the language in the New Testament descriptive of the church 183 originates in the early Christian experience of the community-forming power of the Spirit. The 184 church does not come into being because isolated individuals experience God’s saving love and 185 then take the initiative to seek out other individuals with whom to form a group. The church 186 comes into being because the Spirit of God leads us into community—perhaps with persons with 187 whom we would least expect to associate—as the very matrix of our salvation. That Spirit-188 formed community becomes the context within which we enter into the new life God offers us, 189 and it is a community whose reach is constantly being extended as its members, in the power of 190 the Spirit, offer the gift of community to others, and likewise receive it from them. In that very 191 Spirit, Wesley and those in connection with him found themselves moving beyond the 192 established norms of churchly behavior, and challenging the church, by their own example, to 193 enact more fully God’s gift of community. Thus the term “connection” took on new resonances

194 of meaning, as what Wesley called “social holiness”—the growth in love and in the other fruits
195 of the Spirit that is possible only in community—was realized in new situations and settings.
196 This willingness to transgress boundaries of convention, class, and culture in pursuit of God’s 197 gift of community, notes United Methodist historian Russell Richey, illumines connectionalism’s 198 essentially missional character. From the beginning, connectionalism stood in service of mission, 199 tuning every aspect of Methodist communal life—from structure to polity to discipline—to an 200 “evangelizing and reforming” purpose.<sup>8</sup> Connectionalism, affirms the United Methodist mission 201 document Grace upon Grace, “expresses our missional life. . . . [It is United Methodism’s] 202 means of discovering mission and supporting mission; in this bonding we seek to understand and 203 enact our life of service.”<sup>9</sup>

204 Together, these convictions shape our United Methodist understanding of what it is to be 205 the church. The ways they have come to expression in our history account in part for our 206 particular ways of being the church, within the larger Body of Christ.

207
208 The United Methodist Church traces its origins to certain movements of Christian 209 renewal and revitalization within the established churches of Europe in the seventeenth and 210 eighteenth centuries. Methodism, or the Wesleyan Revival, was the most prominent and durable 211 of a number of such movements in eighteenth-century Britain. Its leader, John Wesley, was an 212 ordained minister in the Church of England. His aim was not to create a new church, separate 213 from the Church of England, but to help that church toward a recovery of its spiritual vitality and

---

<sup>8</sup> Russell E. Richey, with Dennis M. Campbell and William B. Lawrence, Marks of Methodism: Theology In Ecclesial Practice (Abingdon, 2005), 31-32.

<sup>9</sup> Grace Upon Grace: The Mission Statement of The United Methodist Church (Nashville: Graded Press, 1990), 36. A link to an electronic version of this document may be found on the blog site UM & Global, <http://www.umglobal.org/>.

214 its mission. He and the early Methodists adopted some unconventional ways to bring the gospel 215 of Christ to many sorts of people who were not being reached, or were not being reached 216 effectively, by the established church. Wesley's own practice of traveling to where the people 217 were and preaching—in an open field, if necessary—wherever and whenever a group of hearers 218 could be gathered, his commissioning and training of lay preachers to do likewise, and the 219 organization of those hearers who were receiving the gospel into small groups for mutual support
220 and growth in grace, led to the emergence of a “connection” of people across Britain and Ireland 221 that eventually (and only after Wesley's death) took on the full identity of a distinct 222 manifestation of the Christian church.

223         Meanwhile on the continent of Europe another movement known as Pietism had been 224 underway within the churches of the Protestant Reformation. Like Wesley and his people, the 225 Pietists were intent upon realizing the transformative power of the Holy Spirit and upon the 226 spread of the gospel. Like the Methodists, they included in their mission efforts to improve the 227 conditions of life among the poor and vulnerable, to support popular education and the 228 dissemination of knowledge, and to be a Christian presence where such a presence had not yet 229 been known. In fact, a significant influence on John Wesley's life and thought was his 230 acquaintance with representatives of this movement, with whom he engaged at various points in 231 his life. He and the Pietists had their differences, but they also recognized a deep kinship.

232         Participants in both the Methodist movement and varieties of Pietism (which would help 233 to shape the United Brethren and the Evangelical Association) made their way to North America, 234 where they encountered each other as well as some other awakening movements within the 235 Christian churches already present there. They continued their efforts in this new context. There 236 was occasional interaction between Methodists and some of the Pietist leaders and people, and 237 there were some attempts—though none succeeded, in those days—to unify the movements.

238 Both Methodists and Pietists struggled with their relationships to the churches from which they 239 came, and both movements, under the pressure of circumstances, eventually found themselves 240 taking the form of distinct churches. For the most part, it was not doctrinal differences but 241 practical circumstances that led to their making that transition. In the case of the Methodists, the 242 aftermath of the American Revolution was decisive in that it severed the ties with the Church of 243 England (however tenuous they may have already been) that Wesley and his assistants had 244 always hoped to maintain.

245         As they took on a churchly identity, the movements bore witness in various ways to the 246 radical aims and effect of God’s grace. Whether or not the African American preachers, Harry 247 Hosier and Richard Allen, attended the organizing “Christmas Conference” of the Methodist 248 Episcopal Church in Baltimore, Maryland in 1784, the church undertook there to continue its 249 mission of ministering zealously to both slaves and freed persons of African descent, as well as 250 to all others within reach. The initial publication of its Doctrine and Discipline (the precursor of 251 today’s Book of Discipline) courageously mandated its adherents to the freeing of any slaves 252 held. The 1784 conference also prefigured in a symbolic way the new churches’ eventual 253 ministry across numerous ethnic and linguistic boundaries: William Otterbein—pastor of 254 Baltimore’s Evangelical Reformed Church (which helped to host the conference) and later leader 255 of the United Brethren denomination—participated along with the Anglican Thomas Coke in the 256 ordination of Francis Asbury. Later on, Jacob Albright worshiped with the Methodists before 257 leading other German-speaking converts in forming the Evangelical Association.

258         There has followed a complex and often ambiguous history of accomplishments and 259 failures, growth and loss, separations and unions, over the past two centuries and more—a very

260 human history, in which (as its participants would want to testify) God has been steadily at work 261 both within and despite human plans, decisions, and actions. The American Methodists' early 262 commitment to the elimination of slavery was soon compromised, and the ensuing tensions led 263 to several Sunderings of the denomination in the years prior to the American Civil War. Although 264 these Sunderings were partially (and imperfectly) mended many years later, their legacy 265 continues into our own time. A heritage of racism and related difficulties around culture and 266 social class has affected our common life and our efforts at mission in both overt and subtle ways 267 throughout our history, even as our core convictions have offered a constant challenge to 268 overcome it. The United Methodist Church is an heir to, and itself a part of, this history, with its 269 burden and its promise.

270         Like its predecessors, The United Methodist Church continues to reflect on its identity 271 and calling as church. Originating in movements that became denominations more or less by 272 default—and that were instrumental in the development of the modern “denomination” as a 273 distinctive form of Christian association—the two churches that were joined in 1968 brought 274 with them a strong awareness of the provisionality and problematic character of any such 275 denominational arrangements, and perhaps especially of the failure of our separate 276 denominations to enact the fullness of community to which God summons us. At its founding, 277 accordingly, The United Methodist Church committed itself to the ongoing quest for Christian 278 unity—a quest to which members of its predecessor bodies had long given significant leadership.
279 The preamble to its new constitution declared that “[t]he Church of Jesus Christ exists in and for 280 the world, and its very dividedness is a hindrance to its mission in that world.” Article V (now 281 Article VI) of Division One of the Constitution described the new body as “part of the Church 282 Universal,” affirmed that “the Lord of the Church is calling Christians everywhere to strive

283 toward unity,” and committed The United Methodist Church to “seek, and work for, unity at all 284 levels of church life.”<sup>10</sup> The formation of the new church was to be understood not as an end in 285 itself but rather as a relatively modest step on the way to fuller visible unity among Christians.

286 Later, in the revised statement on “Doctrinal Standards and Our Theological Task” 287 adopted in 1988, these commitments were renewed and given some further elaboration:

288 With other Christians, we declare the essential oneness of the church in 289 Christ Jesus. This rich heritage of shared Christian belief finds expression in our 290 hymnody and liturgies. Our unity is affirmed in the historic creeds as we confess 291 one holy, catholic, and apostolic church. It is also experienced in joint ventures of 292 ministry and in various forms of ecumenical cooperation.

293 Nourished by common roots of this shared Christian heritage, the branches 294 of Christ's church have developed diverse traditions that enlarge our store of 295 shared understandings. Our avowed ecumenical commitment as United 296 Methodists is to gather our own doctrinal emphases into the larger Christian unity, 297 there to be made more meaningful in a richer whole.

298 If we are to offer our best gifts to the common Christian treasury, we must 299 make a deliberate effort as a church to strive for critical self-understanding. It is

---

<sup>10</sup> The Book of Discipline of The United Methodist Church 1968 (Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 1968), pp. 16-18. (With slight alterations in typography, these statements were retained in the 2012 Book of Discipline. An amendment adopted in 2012 and ratified subsequently has made explicit a crucial commitment, namely, a sharing in Christ’s prayer for the unity of the church. The line now reads “. . . and therefore it will pray, seek, and work for, unity at all levels of church life.”)

300 as Christians involved in ecumenical partnership that we embrace and examine 301 our distinctive heritage.<sup>11</sup>

302 The hope that many Christians had, half a century ago, for steady progress in Christian 303 unity was soon challenged by new developments both within the churches and in the societies of 304 which they are a part. Faced with a host of social changes, varying in character from one region 305 to another but including such phenomena as increasing religious pluralism, the social 306 transformations brought by new technologies, and changes in the role of religion in society, the 307 churches engaged in the ecumenical quest have sometimes allowed anxiety about their own
308 institutional survival to dampen their interest in that quest. The temptation is to become more 309 inwardly-focused, and perhaps to regard our ecumenical partners as competitors in a diminishing 310 religious marketplace.

311 Still, in the midst of what some have called an “ecumenical winter,” there have been 312 notable achievements. Bilateral and multilateral dialogues have advanced our mutual 313 understanding and have sometimes led to new formal relationships between The United 314 Methodist Church and other bodies. A particularly important precedent for The Church: Towards 315 a Common Vision is the earlier Faith and Order convergence text, Baptism, Eucharist, and 316 Ministry (1982),<sup>12</sup> likewise the product of years of ecumenical work at various levels. Principles

---

<sup>11</sup> “Doctrinal Standards and Our Theological Task,” The Book of Discipline of The United Methodist Church 2012 (Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 2012), p. 48 (¶102).

<sup>12</sup> Faith and Order Paper No. 111 (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982). Downloadable at <http://www.oikoumene.org/en/resources/documents/wcc-commissions/faith-and-order-commission/i-unity-the-church-and-its-mission/baptism-eucharist-and-ministry-faith-and-order-paper-no-111-the-lima-text>. Like the new text on the church, this document—“BEM” for short—involved significant participation by United Methodists and members of other Wesleyan and Methodist communities in its preparation. After its publication, an official United Methodist

317 and insights from that text came to inform our church's subsequent official study documents on 318 Baptism and Holy Communion,<sup>13</sup> the subjects of its first two chapters.

319 No similar study document has been offered so far on the subject of its third chapter:
320 "Ministry." That chapter points toward a substantial amount of convergence among Christian 321 traditions on various aspects of ministry and ministerial ordering. Still, it has been widely felt 322 that this chapter was not as rich in constructive possibilities—perhaps not quite as receptive to 323 the variety of understandings and practices among the churches, and to what might be learned 324 from them—as the first two. There are probably a number of reasons for this perception, as well 325 as for the slowness of the churches to find much common ground in this area. It may be that 326 further progress toward "a mutually recognized ministry" awaits (among other things) a fuller 327 common apprehension of the ecclesial context of ministry. If so, Towards a Common Vision may 328 have a key role to play in that learning process.

329 The United Methodist Church may (and does) affirm itself to be truly the church, but it 330 also acknowledges that is not the whole church. We have things to contribute to a wider 331 common Christian understanding of the church, and we also have things to learn: things to learn 332 about other Christians and churches, and things to learn from them about ourselves. As we response to it was offered under the auspices of the Council of Bishops, and another—reflecting a specific European context and set of concerns—was submitted by the Central Conference for Central and Southern Europe. See Churches Respond to BEM: Official Responses to the "Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry" Text, vol. II, Faith and Order Paper 132, edited by Max Thurian (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1986), pp. 177-199, 200-209.

---

<sup>13</sup> "By Water and the Spirit: A United Methodist Understanding of Baptism" (1996) and "This Holy Mystery" (2004), in The Book of Resolutions of The United Methodist Church 2012 (Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 2012), pp. 922-942 and 942-991. The full texts are available online at <http://www.gbod.org/resources/by-water-and-the-spirit-full-text> and <http://www.gbod.org/resources/this-holy-mystery-a-united-methodist-understanding-of-holy-communion1>.

333 undertake to realize a renewed ecclesial vision for The United Methodist Church, we are 334 committed to doing this work, as we have in the past, in an ecumenical context.

335
 336
 337
 338
 339

II. A Renewed Vision for The United Methodist Church

340 The three convictions described above provide a promising guide to the main elements of 341 such a vision. We begin with the affirmation that the church is first of all not our creation, but 342 God's. It is, of course, a reality that our participation helps to shape, but it originates in the self-343 gift to us of the triune God. The saving love of God creates community. From this point, we 344 move second to consider the implications for the life of the church that the saving love of God is 345 meant for all people, and third to a consideration of what it is to affirm and realize that the saving love of God is transformative.

346
 347
 348
 349

The Church as a Gift of the Triune God

350 The saving love of God creates community. In the classic creeds, the church is mentioned 351 immediately after the Holy Spirit. In the Apostles' Creed they are affirmed literally in the same 352 breath: "I believe in the Holy Spirit, the holy catholic church . . . ." In the more widely used 353 Nicene Creed,<sup>14</sup> "We believe in the one holy catholic and apostolic church" comes just after the 354 profession of faith in the Holy Spirit, who is described as "the Lord, the giver of life." Evidently, 355 in the judgment of the makers of the creeds and of those who have affirmed their faith with them through the centuries, the church has something to do with the Spirit's giving of life. As the

---

<sup>14</sup> Technically the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, the expanded version of the creed of the Council of Nicea (325) adopted by the Council of Constantinople (381) and commonly known thereafter as the Nicene Creed. For the texts of both the Apostles' and the Nicene Creed, see UMH 880-882.

356 early Christian writer Irenaeus of Lyon declared succinctly: “Where the church is, there also is 357 the Spirit of God; and where the Spirit of God is, there is the church and all grace.”<sup>15</sup>

358 One luminous sentence in the first paragraph of Towards a Common Vision speaks to this 359 point, and at the same time provides a key to the understanding of the church that the document 360 as a whole presents: “Communion, whose source is the very life of the Holy Trinity, is both the 361 gift by which the Church lives and, at the same time, the gift that God calls the Church to offer to 362 a wounded and divided humanity in hope of reconciliation and healing” (1, p. 5).<sup>16</sup>

363 It is communion that the Spirit gives, and that animates—or we might say, creates—the 364 church. In the Greek of the New Testament, the term is koinonia: a word that is properly 365 translated in a variety of ways depending on context and usage, including “communion,” 366 “sharing,” participation,” “partaking,” “fellowship,” and “community.” The “communion of the 367 Holy Spirit” of 2 Cor. 13:13, the “sharing in the body of Christ” of 1 Cor. 10:16, the “becom[ing]
368 participants of the divine nature” of 2 Peter 1:4, all involve this reality of koinonia.<sup>17</sup> The “gift by 369 which the church lives” is simply the love of God poured out for us, decisively in the life and 370 ministry of Jesus Christ, a love in which we are invited to share. The life of the church is a

---

<sup>15</sup> Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses III, 24, 1, cited in Boris Bobrinskoy, Le mystère de l'Église: Cours de théologie dogmatique (Paris: Cerf, 2003), p. 14.

<sup>16</sup> In parenthetical references to passages in Towards a Common Vision, the paragraph number will be given, followed by the page number of the printed English version. The paragraphs are numbered consecutively throughout the text's four chapters and conclusion.

<sup>17</sup> “The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of [note: or “and the sharing in”] the Holy Spirit be with all of you” (2 Cor 13:13 NRSV). “The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not a sharing in the blood of Christ? The bread that we break, is it not a sharing in the body of Christ?” (1 Cor 10:16 NRSV). “Thus he has given us, through these things, his precious and very great promises, so that through them you may escape from the corruption that is in the world because of lust, and may become participants of the divine nature” (2 Peter 1:4 NRSV). Further passages are cited in the brief discussion of the term koinonia to be found in paragraph 13 (p. 10) of Towards a Common Vision.

371 sharing in the life of the Triune God, and the mission of the church is to communicate that 372 possibility to a world in need: to serve as “sign and servant” (25, p. 15) of God’s saving presence 373 to the world. The invocation of the Holy Spirit in the “Great Thanksgiving” at Holy Communion 374 makes these connections well:

375           Pour out your Holy Spirit on us, gathered here, and on these gifts of bread and 376           wine.

377           Make them be for us the body and blood of Christ, that we may be for the world 378           the body of Christ, redeemed by his blood.

379           By your Spirit make us one with Christ, one with each other, and one in ministry 380           to all the world . . . .<sup>18</sup>

381           Aspects of our own Wesleyan heritage resonate deeply with this affirmation of the 382           centrality of koinonia to the life and mission of the church. When John Wesley, in a late sermon 383           on “The New Creation,” wished to portray the final goal of human life—the end for which we 384           are created, and to which we are to be restored through Christ—he used these words: “And to 385           crown all, there will be a deep, an intimate, an uninterrupted union with God; a constant 386           communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, through the Spirit; a continual enjoyment 387           of the Three-One God, and of all the creatures in him!”<sup>19</sup> For Wesley, and for his followers, we 388           are given a foretaste of this goal, and more than a foretaste, here and now. Salvation is “a

---

<sup>18</sup> “Word and Table: Service I,” The United Methodist Hymnal (Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 1989), p. 10.

<sup>19</sup> John Wesley, “The New Creation,” Sermons II, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1985), p. 510.

389 present thing,” Wesley declared; the term rightly embraces “the entire work of God, from the 390 first dawning of grace in the soul till it is consummated in glory.”<sup>20</sup> Human beings are “created 391 in the image of God, and designed to know, to love, and to enjoy [their] Creator to all eternity.”<sup>21</sup> 392 Wesley’s understanding of our “fallen” state involves the distortion or loss of those capacities for 393 knowledge, love, and joy—in short, for communion with God and with one another—and 394 salvation involves their recovery and their eventual fulfillment in glory, when (as his brother 395 Charles memorably wrote) we are to be “lost in wonder, love, and praise.”<sup>22</sup> The history of 396 salvation is, as Towards a Common Vision puts it, “the dynamic history of God’s restoration of 397 koinonia” (1, p. 5). To the extent that these Wesleyan themes still inform our witness, hymnody, 398 and common life, we have ample reason to make our own the affirmation that communion is 399 indeed “the gift by which the church lives,” and the gift that it is called to offer the world.

400         We might want to say, then, that, theologically understood, the church is not an 401 association of like-minded individuals serving purposes they may have devised for themselves.
402 Instead, it is a community established by God, grounded in the very life of God, an aspect of the 403 new creation.

404         We might want to say that, but we should not; at least, we should not stop there. It is an 405 oversimplification. It is correct in what it affirms about the ultimate source of the church’s 406 reality and about what truly sustains it as a manifestation of koinonia. But it is mistaken in what

---

<sup>20</sup> John Wesley, “The Scripture Way of Salvation,” Sermons II, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1985), p. 156.

<sup>21</sup> John Wesley, “God’s Approbation of His Works,” Sermons II, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1985), p. 397. In a wonderful line from one of Charles Wesley’s hymns, we are “ordained to be / transcripts of the Trinity” (“Sinners, Turn: Why Will You Die,” The United Methodist Hymnal [Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 1989], #346).

<sup>22</sup> “Love Divine, All Loves Excelling,” The United Methodist Hymnal, #384.

407 it implicitly denies. The truth—the theological truth, even—is that the church is indeed also a 408 very human community, an association of often all too like-minded individuals, and that it does 409 also serve human purposes quite distinct from, and sometimes counter to, the purposes of God.

410 This, too, is recognized in the very first chapter of Towards a Common Vision, and 411 throughout the text. To say that “the Church is both a divine and a human reality” (23, p. 14) is 412 to say that alongside our awareness that the church is a gift of the Triune God, “the creature of 413 God’s Word and of the Holy Spirit,”<sup>23</sup> we must place an equally clear awareness of what its 414 human reality implies. We must, in our theology itself, come to terms with the human uses of the 415 church.

416 Like other religious traditions and communities, Christian churches serve a variety of 417 human needs and purposes, in ways that vary a great deal from one place and time to another.
418 They commonly serve human needs for order, coherence, stability, belief-reinforcement, 419 companionship, ethical guidance, and so forth. They are affected at every point by the typical 420 ways human beings interact with each other in the satisfaction of those needs. They are also put 421 to use in the service of other interests on the part of adherents and “outsiders” alike, for example, 422 by being made to serve particular political and economic ends. No one acquainted with the 423 history of the Christian churches from the earliest centuries onward can fail to acknowledge this 424 complex intertwining of human needs, desires, ambitions, and fears in that history. Sometimes it 425 is much easier to recognize those elements in the life of the church in some other place and time 426 than in one’s own.

---

<sup>23</sup> The Nature and Mission of the Church, Faith and Order Paper 198 (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2005), 9, p. 13. This paper was, as its subtitle indicates, a precursor to the 2013 text: “a stage on the way to a common statement.”

427           Some of these common human uses are clearly consistent with the church's own mission 428 as sign and servant of koinonia. In such cases, we might say that God's purpose and human 429 purposes are aligned, in the meeting of genuine human need and in the service of the well-being 430 of God's creation. In other cases, the human use may be in direct conflict with the divine 431 purpose—as, for instance, when the church is serving, whether unwittingly or deliberately, as the 432 instrument of an ideology of national, racial, ethnic, or gender superiority. Towards a Common 433 Vision cites one variety of this misuse: “At times, the cultural and religious heritage of those to 434 whom the Gospel was proclaimed was not given the respect it deserved, as when those engaging 435 in evangelization were complicit in imperialistic colonization, which pillaged and even 436 exterminated peoples unable to defend themselves from more powerful invading nations” (6, p.
437 7). In recent years, The United Methodist Church has been brought to a new awareness that its 438 own history is not free of involvements in events of this sort, much as we may prefer to recall 439 happier stories.<sup>24</sup> To edit out those parts of an account of our past (and present) that do not 440 reflect so well on us is to deceive ourselves as well as others, and leaves us ill-equipped for the 441 careful discernment that our calling requires. In this discernment, the vision of the gift of 442 koinonia which is God's will for the church in all times and places is a vital point of reference.

443

444

445

446

447

Community of Salvation and Community as Sign

448           The saving love of God is meant for all people. The Bible does not set forth one 449 normative model or understanding of the church. There is no blueprint in the New Testament to be followed. However, Scripture does offer abundant resources for our thinking about the ways

---

<sup>24</sup> Resolution 3323, “Healing Relationships with Indigenous Persons,” and a number of acts of remembrance and repentance which have been undertaken in connection with it, are hopeful signs of this new awareness. See Book of Resolutions 2012, pp. 419-420.

450 God works to establish or restore communion with and among humankind. Some of these 451 scriptural images and concepts have had influential roles in the history of Christian thought and 452 practice, though the weight given to particular leading images has varied from one time and 453 place to another. Others have received relatively little attention. Three of the more prominent 454 ones—“people of God,” “body of Christ,” “temple of the Holy Spirit”— have been frequently 455 cited and explored in contemporary ecumenical discussion, partly because of the ways their 456 differences provoke our thinking. Together, they help to make the point that koinonia is the gift 457 of the Triune God, and also that our realization of and response to that gift may take different 458 forms. We have a standing invitation to explore the richness and variety of images, metaphors, 459 and ideas that the biblical writers used to portray the character of the new community God is 460 creating.

461         One more prosaic term that, in company with such images as the three just mentioned, 462 may offer a promising approach to the range of meanings of “church” and the many forms it can 463 take is the one most frequently used in the New Testament to designate the Christian community: 464 ekklesia. Usually rendered as “church” in English translations of the New Testament,<sup>25</sup> it is 465 “community” (Gemeinde) in Luther’s German New Testament, while in Latin-derived languages 466 it retains something of the Latin transliteration, ecclesia, as in the French église, Spanish iglesia, 467 or Italian chiesa. In New Testament times and for some centuries before, ekklesia was a 468 common Greek term for an assembly or gathering, such as the meeting of voting citizens in a 469 Greek city-state. It is also the word normally used in the Greek translation of the Hebrew

---

<sup>25</sup> “Church” actually comes from another Greek word, kyriake, “belonging to the Lord,” which was never used in the New Testament to refer to the Christian community. This usage arose later, and eventually made its way into English. Some early English translations, notably that of William Tyndale, rendered ekklesia as “congregation” rather than as “church”—an option that the royal instructions to the translators of the King James Version explicitly ruled out.

470 scriptures, the Septuagint, to translate the Hebrew term qahal, likewise a generic term for 471 assembly or gathering—a religious meeting, for instance, or an armed array ready for battle. One 472 of the more durable uses of qahal/ekklesia, in early Christian as well as Jewish memory, was in 473 connection with the assembly of the people at Sinai at the giving of the Torah (“the day of the 474 assembly,” Deuteronomy 18:16) and with the anticipation of an ultimate joyous and redemptive 475 gathering of all the people of God, as described for instance in Isaiah 25:6-9. Ekklesia, then, in 476 the mind of a writer such as Paul, had a useful range. It could refer to a particular local 477 community of Christians, or collectively to the sum of such local communities, or to the whole 478 people of God in all times and places (the “Church universal,” as it is sometimes called).

479 Both “assembly” and “gathering,” along with “convocation,” “congregation,” and some 480 other terms that have been employed at different times to render ekklesia, have some interesting 481 flexibility: they can refer to an action or process (coming together, being brought together), or to 482 the group that is formed, or to the members of that group whether or not they happen to be 483 assembled at the moment. Still, Luther—anticipating a number of present-day interpreters—484 probably had it right: the best contemporary equivalent for ekklesia in a Christian context may 485 well be “community.” This is particularly convincing if we keep in mind the close connections 486 between the theme of gathering (ekklesia) and the theme of communion (koinonia).<sup>26</sup> Among 487 human beings, communion takes the form of community.

488 Ekklesia has an additional connotation for the particular strands of Protestant tradition 489 which have shaped United Methodism. Among the standards of doctrine of The United

---

<sup>26</sup> Helpful reflections on the usages of ekklesia may be found in Paula Gooder, “In Search of the Early ‘Church’: The New Testament and the Development of Christian Communities,” Routledge Companion to the Christian Church, edited by Gerard Mannion and Lewis S. Mudge (New York and London: Routledge, 2008), pp. 9-27, and in Gordon W. Lathrop, Holy People: A Liturgical Ecclesiology (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1999), pp. 21-48.

490 Methodist Church are the Articles of Religion brought into the union by The Methodist Church 491 and the Confession of Faith brought into it by the Evangelical United Brethren Church. Each 492 contains an article on the Church, along with other material relevant to the subject. The two 493 principal articles are these:

494 First, from the Articles of Religion, Article XIII—Of the Church:

495 The visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men in which the pure 496 Word of God is preached, and the Sacraments duly administered according to 497 Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.

498 And from the Confession of Faith, Article V—The Church:

499

500 We believe the Christian Church is the community of all true believers under the 501 Lordship of Christ. We believe it is one, holy, apostolic and catholic. It is the 502 redemptive fellowship in which the Word of God is preached by men divinely 503 called, and the sacraments are duly administered according to Christ's own 504 appointment. Under the discipline of the Holy Spirit the Church exists for the 505 maintenance of worship, the edification of believers and the redemption of the 506 world.

507 The first definition, from the Methodist Articles, is essentially a reproduction of the 508 corresponding article (XIX) in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England (1563), based 509 in turn upon Article VII of the Lutheran Augsburg Confession (1530). It identifies the church 510 (ecclesia, in the Latin version of the Anglican and Lutheran texts) as a “congregation of faithful 511 men” (“and women,” we might add to be true to the sense today, or we might render coetus

512 fidelium more literally as “congregation of the faithful”), assembled by and for Word and 513 Sacrament. Although some classical Protestant doctrines of the church derive from this basic 514 affirmation the conclusion that there are two essential “marks” of the church—authentic 515 proclamation of the Word, and proper administration of the Sacraments—others identify three 516 such marks: in addition to Word and Sacrament, there is the mark of faithfulness itself, or 517 discipleship, or discipline, or of a common life ordered by the promises of God. It is this latter 518 scheme that, from the Protestant side, enters into our ecumenical understandings of the triadic or 519 triune shape of the church’s life and mission.

520         The second definition, reflecting the Evangelical United Brethren heritage, contains basic 521 elements of the first, but enriches it in several ways. (As with the “faithful men” of the first 522 definition, we would today want to say that the Word is preached “by women and men divinely 523 called” or “by persons divinely called.” The latter phrase is used when an abridgement of this 524 article is incorporated into the definition of the local church in Book of Discipline 2012, ¶201). It 525 makes more explicit the element of faithful response—the third “mark”—with such terms as 526 “redemptive fellowship” and with reference to the church’s mission, and it also includes the 527 adjectives from the Nicene Creed identifying the church as “one, holy, apostolic and catholic.”

528         A noteworthy feature of the first-quoted article—and, by implication, of the second, 529 which builds upon it—is that it offers a definition of the visible church. A distinction between the 530 “visible church” and the “invisible church” was common at the time of the Protestant 531 Reformation, with roots going back much farther. As conventionally understood, the visible 532 church was an actual community, a local congregation of professing Christians or a larger body 533 incorporating many local congregations, who hear and affirm the Word rightly preached, partake 534 of the sacraments, and support the church’s ministry. The invisible church was understood to be 535 the totality of persons who are actually saved, or on their way to salvation. This company is 536 “invisible” in the sense that no one but God knows with certainty who is included in it. It was 537 commonly assumed (and often asserted by theologians and preachers) that with a few exceptions

538 the members of the invisible church, the truly saved, were also professing Christians, members 539 of the visible church; but that the visible church also contains (to use John Calvin’s words) “a 540 very large mixture of hypocrites, who have nothing of Christ but the name and outward 541 appearance.”<sup>27</sup>

542         The perspective of many Christians and of many Christian communities on this matter 543 has shifted in more recent years. Towards a Common Vision (25, p. 15) represents widespread, 544 though not unanimous, convergence here among the churches involved in the ecumenical 545 movement:

546         Since God wills all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth 547 (cf. 1 Tim. 2:4), Christians acknowledge that God reaches out to those who are 548 not explicit members of the Church, in ways that may not be immediately evident 549 to human eyes. While respecting the elements of truth and goodness that can be 550 found in other religions and among those with no religion, the mission of the 551 Church remains that of inviting, through witness and testimony, all men and 552 women to come to know and love Christ Jesus.

553         What such a statement allows is the possibility that persons who are not “explicit 554 members” of the church may yet be, in some sense, members of the church, participants in the

---

<sup>27</sup> John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, translated by Henry Beveridge (London: James Clarke, 1962), volume 2, p. 288 (IV, 1, 7).

555 one ekklesia of God, sharers in the communion God offers. Note that the statement does not 556 suggest that all persons are, in fact, responding to the love of God in such a way, nor does it 557 imply that those who do so respond are therefore “really Christians” without knowing it. It does, 558 however, imply that God’s koinonia may be encountered in other forms and other places. If God 559 is reaching out to those beyond our Christian communities in ways hidden to us, and if they are 560 responding to God’s love in positive ways, then perhaps we need a more expansive concept of 561 “church” than we have been accustomed to using. (As Irenaeus said long ago, “where the Spirit 562 of God is, there is the church and all grace.”) The church, in the sense of the one ekklesia of God, 563 the community of salvation, is not coextensive with the churches that we know. Those churches 564 that we know participate in that larger ekklesia (however imperfectly), but their distinctive task is 565 to be the explicit sign and servant of God’s salvific self-giving to humankind—to be, as some 566 traditions would find it natural to say, a sacrament—through their worship of God, their care and 567 nurture of those who come to faith through their witness, and their service to God’s reconciling 568 and redemptive purpose.

569         The churches carry on this work entrusted to them more or less well. In the apt words of 570 the Westminster Confession, the church “hath been sometimes more, sometimes less visible” in 571 those communities that call themselves churches.<sup>28</sup>

572         John Wesley lamented the fact that many professing Christians of his day seemed at best 573 to have “the form of godliness, but not the power thereof” (cf. 2 Tim 3:5), not because God had 574 decreed their exclusion from salvation, but because they were refusing to use the grace they were 575 given by the God who “wants all people to be saved” (I Tim 2:4). At the same time, Wesley was 576 unwilling to believe that the multitudes of people who were not professing Christians—for

---

<sup>28</sup> Westminster Confession of Faith, 25.4.

577 example, the large numbers of the poor in England who were alienated from the church and felt 578 excluded by it, or the millions around the world who had never heard the Gospel—were utterly 579 deprived of God’s grace on that account, for reasons beyond their control. On the contrary, he 580 was convinced that Christ died for all, that the guilt of “inbeing sin” that may have been incurred 581 through the fall of our first parents had been cancelled for all, and that grace was available to 582 all.<sup>29</sup> A lesson we might learn from Wesley is that we need, on the one hand, to exercise a 583 realistically self-critical capacity when it comes to the quality of our own life and witness as 584 Christians and Christian communities, to be alert to the dangers of self-deception and aware of 585 our own permanent need for repentance and renewal; and, on the other hand, to be open to the 586 presence of God in our neighbors, including our non-Christian neighbors, and open to the love of

---

<sup>29</sup> “I have no authority from the Word of God ‘to judge those that are without’ [the Christian dispensation]. No do I conceive that any man living has a right to sentence all the heathen and Mahometan world to damnation. It is far better to leave them to him that made them, and who is ‘the Father of the spirits of all flesh’; who is the God of the heathens as well as the Christians, and who hateth nothing that he hath made. . . . [I]f the heart of a man be filled (by the grace of God, and the power of his Spirit) with the humble, gentle, patient love of God and man, God will not cast him into the everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels because his ideas are not clear, or because his conceptions are confused.” “On living without God,” Sermons IV, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1987), pp. 174-175. In his comment on Acts 10:34-35—“Then Peter began to speak to them: ‘I truly understand that God shows no partiality. But in every nation anyone who fears him and does what is right is acceptable to him’”—in his Notes on the New Testament, Wesley wrote: “But in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness - He that, first, reverences God, as great, wise, good, the cause, end, and governor of all things; and secondly, from this awful regard to him, not only avoids all known evil, but endeavours, according to the best light he has, to do all things well; is accepted of him - Through Christ, though he knows him not. The assertion is express, and admits of no exception. He is in the favour of God, whether enjoying his written word and ordinances or not. Nevertheless the addition of these is an unspeakable blessing to those who were before in some measure accepted. Otherwise God would never have sent an angel from heaven to direct Cornelius to St. Peter.”

587 God that may come to us through them. Such a stance is, in fact, reflected in United Methodist 588 teaching concerning our relations to those of other religious traditions.<sup>30</sup>

589         Speaking of the Christian church as a whole—in ecumenical writings, this is normally 590 “the Church” with a capital “C”—Towards a Common Vision offers a helpful brief account (in 591 22, pp. 13-14) of ecumenical convergence on how the four Nicene “marks” cited in our 592 Confession of Faith may be understood. “The Church is one because God is one (cf. John 17:11, 593 1 Tim. 2:5). . . . The Church is holy because God is holy (cf. Is. 6:3; Lev. 11:44-45).” The 594 Church is catholic because God intends it for all people, the whole world. The Church is 595 apostolic because of its origins in witnesses sent (an apostle is “one who is sent”) by the Triune 596 God and its call “to be ever faithful to those apostolic origins.” In each case, the text notes that 597 our actual performance falls short: again, the divine reality of the Church is “sometimes more, 598 sometimes less visible” in its human reality.

599         “Legitimate diversity in the life of communion is a gift from the Lord” (28, p. 16). No 600 reference to “the Church” in the singular should be taken to imply that differences have no place 601 in the Christian community. The fact that the Triune God is the source of our communion should 602 be enough to remind us that it is a dynamic, relational unity, not a monolithic uniformity, that is 603 to be sought. The gifts of the Spirit differ in character (1 Cor. 12:4-7) and are exercised in 604 different ways for the common good. Also, human beings and their cultures differ from one 605 another in manifold ways, and these differences enrich our koinonia. Particular actual 606 churches—local congregations, historical Christian traditions and their various strands and 607 organizational groupings—have their own ways of being church. They are free to differ, and to 608 some extent they must differ, in order to relate to the situations in which they find themselves

---

<sup>30</sup> Cf. “Called to be Neighbors and Witnesses: Guidelines for Interreligious Relationships,” Book of Resolutions 2012, pp. 269-279.

609 and in order to realize their particular gifts. “Legitimate diversity is compromised whenever 610 Christians consider their own cultural expressions of the Gospel as the only authentic ones, to be 611 imposed upon Christians of other cultures” (28, p. 16).

612         How legitimate diversity may be distinguished from illegitimate diversity is a question 613 still seeking a clear answer in an ecumenical context, as Towards a Common Vision 614 acknowledges (30, pp. 16-17). An abstract principle may be agreed upon, such as that 615 illegitimate diversity is that which undermines the unity of the church; but a formula of this sort 616 is readily susceptible to misuse. In a comment on the issue, the text ponders what may be 617 needed:

618         Though all churches have their own procedures for distinguishing legitimate from 619 illegitimate diversity, it is clear that two things are lacking: (a) common criteria, 620 or means of discernment, and (b) such mutually recognized structures as are 621 needed to use these effectively. All churches seek to follow the will of the Lord 622 yet they continue to disagree on some aspects of faith and order and, moreover, on 623 whether such disagreements are Church-divisive or, instead, part of legitimate 624 diversity. We invite the churches to consider: what positive steps can be taken to 625 make common discernment possible?

626 As the text implicitly acknowledges later on (63, p. 35), its statement here that “all churches have 627 their own procedures for distinguishing legitimate from illegitimate diversity” may not be 628 entirely accurate. There would seem to be divided judgments within a number of the churches at 629 present on this very point—that is, as to whether or not a particular difference in doctrine or 630 practice constitutes legitimate diversity—and no workable means of resolving the question. In 631 such a situation, the same things may be needed that the text finds lacking in the ecumenical 632 context: “(a) common criteria, or means of discernment, and (b) such mutually recognized 633 structures as are needed to use these effectively.” A church that finds itself in these 634 circumstances may need to ask itself the same question this text poses to the churches together: 635 What positive steps can be taken to make common discernment possible? In tackling that 636 question, each church may be helped by entering into the ecumenical conversation on this 637 subject, becoming acquainted with the approaches other churches have taken to discerning the 638 limits of diversity, learning from their experience, and re-examining its own approach in that 639 light. We will return to this question at a later point.

640

641

642

Faith, Hope, and Love

643

644

The saving love of God is transformative. The character and direction of that 645 transformation is well summarized in the familiar Pauline triad, “faith, hope, and love” (1 646 Corinthians 13:13). John Wesley and our Methodist traditions would certainly echo Paul’s 647 affirmation that “the greatest of these is love.” But neither Wesley nor we would want to neglect 648 the other two elements of the triad. All three are vital, and intimately interrelated. There is a 649 triadic—or, better put, a Trinitarian—character to the life that God gives us in community, and 650 for that reason there is a triadic or Trinitarian character to the way the church manifests God’s 651 love in the world.

652 It is no surprise, then, that throughout the chapters of Towards a Common Vision there

653 occur triadic descriptions of what the church is called to be and do. For example, in a brief

654 exposition of the Great Commission in Matthew 28:18-20 and of corresponding passages

655 elsewhere in the Gospels, the text states that in order to carry out Jesus’ mandate, the church was 656 to be “a community of witness, . . . a community of worship, . . . [and] a community of 657 discipleship” (2, p. 6). Throughout its history, it goes on to observe, the church has been 658 engaged in “proclaiming in word and deed the good news of salvation in Christ, celebrating the 659 sacraments, especially the eucharist, and forming Christian communities” (5, p. 7). Again, 660 “[t]he Holy Spirit nourishes and enlivens the body of Christ through the living voice of the 661 preached Gospel, through sacramental communion, especially in the Eucharist, and through 662 ministries of service” (16, p. 11). Quoting from an earlier ecumenical study, it affirms that the 663 church “reveals Christ to the world by proclaiming the Gospel, by celebrating the sacraments, . .

664 . and by manifesting the newness of life given by him, thus anticipating the Kingdom already 665 present in him” (58, p. 33). And the Conclusion of the text (67, p. 39) declares:

666           The unity of the body of Christ consists in the gift of koinonia or communion that 667           God graciously bestows upon human beings. There is a growing consensus that 668           koinonia, as communion with the Holy Trinity, is manifested in three interrelated 669           ways: unity in faith, unity in sacramental life, and unity in service (in all its forms, 670           including ministry and mission).

671           In its exploration of the image of the church as the people of God, the text relates this 672           triadic structure in the life and mission of the church explicitly to the classic doctrine of the 673           “threefold office” of Christ as prophet, priest, and king: “The whole people of God is called to 674           be a prophetic people, bearing witness to God’s word; a priestly people, offering the sacrifice of 675           a life lived in discipleship; and a royal people, serving as instruments for the establishment of 676           God’s reign.” For emphasis, it adds: “All members of the church share in this vocation” (19, p.
677           12).

678           This would seem to be an important point of ecumenical convergence. There is a parallel 679 in the teaching of the Second Vatican Council in its Dogmatic Constitution on the Church which 680 describes the laity as “all the faithful . . . who by baptism are incorporated into Christ, are 681 constituted the people of God, who have been made sharers in their own way in the priestly,
 682 prophetic, and kingly office of Christ and play their part in carrying out the mission of the whole
 683 Christian people in the church and in the world.”<sup>31</sup> A similar approach is taken in Orthodox 684 ecclesiology, and can be found in a growing number of ecumenical documents. For example, the 685 International Commission on Methodist-Catholic Dialogue stated in its Brighton report (2001): 686 “Because Christ’s followers are incorporated into him through baptism, they share in his priestly, 687 prophetic and royal office, together as a communion and individually each in their own way.”<sup>32</sup>

688           From a United Methodist standpoint, these connections could be carried further, 689 enriching our understanding of the nature and calling of the church as koinonia. John Wesley 690 urged the early Methodists to proclaim Christ “in all his offices.”<sup>33</sup> The reference was to the

---

<sup>31</sup> In Vatican Council II: The Basic Sixteen Documents, edited by Austin Flannery, O.P. (Northport, New York: Costello Publishing Co., 1996), pp. 48-49.

<sup>32</sup> “Speaking the Truth in Love,” §§35-36, cited in Synthesis: Together to Holiness, Forty Years of Methodist and Roman Catholic Dialogue, ed. Michael E. Putney and Geoffrey Wainwright (n.p., [2010], §73.

<sup>33</sup> Wesley declares, “We are not ourselves clear before God, unless we proclaim him in all his offices. To preach Christ, as a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, is to preach him, not only as our great High Priest, ‘taken from among men, and ordained for men, in things pertaining to God;’ as such, ‘reconciling us to God by his blood,’ and ‘ever living to make intercession for us;’ — but likewise as the Prophet of the Lord, ‘who of God is made unto us wisdom,’ who, by his word and his Spirit, is with us always, ‘guiding us into all truth;’ — yea, and as remaining a King for ever; as giving laws to all whom he has bought with his blood; as restoring those to the image of God, whom he had first re-instated in his favour; as reigning in all believing hearts until he has ‘subdued all things to himself,’ — until he hath utterly cast out all sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness” (“The Law Established Through Faith, Discourse II,” Sermons II, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1985), pp. 37-38). See further from the “Large Minutes” of 1745: “Q. 19. What is the best

691 doctrine of the three offices (or threefold office, munus triplex) of Christ, as priest, prophet, and 692 king. In the Hebrew scriptures, the role or work of the Messiah (the Christ, the anointed one) is 693 pictured in a variety of ways, with these three commonly judged to be the most prominent.
694 Found in early Christian writings, the idea that Jesus fulfills these three roles together comes into 695 our United Methodist heritage more directly both from Wesley (with Anglican theology and 696 John Calvin in the background) and from the Heidelberg Catechism (1563) which was an 697 important part of the doctrinal heritage of the Evangelical United Brethren.

698         The threefold office seemed to have particular resonance for Wesley, as it matched up 699 with his understanding of salvation—of what we are saved from and of what we are saved to. If 700 we are meant “to know, to love, and to enjoy [our] Creator to all eternity,”<sup>34</sup> and if in our present 701 problematic state—a state of misery, as Wesley says—we are unable rightly to exercise those 702 capacities for knowledge, love, and happiness, then what we need is nothing less than a 703 regeneration of those capacities. We need to be set free from our bondage to ignorance, 704 lovelessness, and hopelessness (or from our captivity to lies and distortions, from misguided 705 loves and misplaced hopes). We need to be born again, and nourished in a new life in “the 706 glorious liberty of the children of God” (Romans 8:21 KJV). This is the possibility that Christ
707 brings to us, and that the Holy Spirit actuates in us. Wesley wanted his preachers and his people 708 to keep that comprehensive vision in mind, and not to settle for reductionist, “one-office”

---

general method of preaching? A. To invite, to convince, to offer Christ, to build up; and to do this in some measure in every sermon. The most effectual way of preaching Christ is to preach him in all his offices; and to declare his law as well as his Gospel, both to believers and unbelievers.” A further short exposition of the three offices (and our need of them) is to be found in Wesley’s note on Matthew 1:16 in his Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament.

<sup>34</sup>John Wesley, “God’s Approbation of His Works,” Sermons II, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1985), p. 397.

709 accounts of salvation. The realization of the koinonia for which we are created, and of which the 710 church is to be both sign and servant, involves being freed from those conditions (both external 711 and internal) that make us miserable, and entering into the harmony of knowledge, love, and joy 712 with the Triune God and with all creation.

713         Towards a Common Vision testifies to a convergence among the churches on the point 714 that to proclaim Christ in all his offices is not just the work of preachers. It is the work of the 715 whole church, the calling of the whole people of God, personally and corporately; it is the 716 general ministry of all Christians. For their part, United Methodists have acknowledged this fact 717 and its implications in a number of ways—for example, in affirming that the critical and 718 constructive theological reflection that this work requires is likewise a task and responsibility of 719 the whole church, to be undertaken both individually and communally: “As United Methodists, 720 we have an obligation to bear a faithful Christian witness to Jesus Christ, the living reality at the 721 center of the Church’s life and witness. To fulfill this obligation, we reflect critically on our 722 biblical and theological inheritance, striving to express faithfully the witness we make in our 723 own time.”<sup>35</sup>

724         Although it informs and shapes the life and mission of the whole people of God—or, 725 perhaps, because it does so—this threefold pattern also informs and shapes the ordained 726 ministry. “[F]rom earliest times,” Towards a Common Vision observes, “some believers were 727 chosen under the guidance of the Spirit and given specific authority and responsibility. Ordained 728 ministers ‘assemble and build up the Body of Christ by proclaiming and teaching the Word of

---

<sup>35</sup> “Doctrinal Standards and Our Theological Task,” The Book of Discipline of The United Methodist Church 2012 (Nashville: The United Methodist Publishing House, 2012), pp. 79-80 (¶105).

729 God, by celebrating the sacraments and by guiding the life of the community in its worship, its 730 mission and its caring ministry” (19, p. 12).<sup>36</sup>

731 Accordingly, The United Methodist Church at its uniting conference in 1968 adopted an 732 account of the ordained ministry which describes it as a “specialized ministry of Word, 733 Sacrament, and Order.”<sup>37</sup> This new formulation, which does not appear in the official depictions 734 of ordained ministry in either of the predecessor denominations, reflected the influence of 735 contemporary ecumenical conversation as well as the established patterns of a number of other 736 Christian communities. The account set down in the 1968 Book of Discipline corresponds closely 737 to that just quoted from Towards a Common Vision:

738 Ordination is the rite of the Church by which some are entrusted with the 739 authority to be ministers of Word, Sacrament, and Order:

740 1. To be ordained to the ministry of the Word is to be authorized to preach 741 and teach the Word of God.

742 2. To be ordained to the ministry of Sacrament is to be authorized to 743 administer the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord’s Supper.

744 3. To be ordained to the ministry of Order is to be authorized to equip the 745 laity for ministry, to exercise pastoral oversight, and to administer the Discipline 746 of the Church.<sup>38</sup>

---

<sup>36</sup> The internal quotation is from Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, section on Ministry, § 13.

<sup>37</sup> Book of Discipline 1968, ¶302 (p. 107).

<sup>38</sup> Book of Discipline 1968, ¶309 (pp. 109-10).

747           It should be said that this commonly-recognized triadic pattern in the church’s ministry is 748 something distinct from the “threefold ministry” of ordained deacons, presbyters, and bishops in 749 historic succession that is claimed by some Christian communities, and that BEM proposed to the 750 serious consideration of all the churches in their quest for visible unity. The churches’ responses 751 to BEM indicated that we are far from any convergence on this point, and that it may be unwise 752 to link the mutual recognition of ministries to any agreement on this or any other particular 753 arrangement of ministerial offices or system of governance. The approach to the issue in 754 Towards a Common Vision reflects this situation. In BEM, the “burden of proof” seemed to be 755 placed on the churches that do not follow the threefold-ministry pattern: they “need to ask 756 themselves whether the threefold pattern as developed does not have a powerful claim to be 757 accepted by them.”<sup>39</sup> In light of responses received to this challenge, in Towards a Common 758 Vision the question is posed more equitably. “[W]e are led to ask if the churches can achieve a 759 consensus as to whether or not the threefold ministry is part of God’s will for the church in its 760 realization of the unity which God wills” (47, p. 27).

761           This is a complex issue, and one that deserves fuller treatment in another context. It 762 continues to be seriously pursued in a variety of ecumenical dialogues and relationships in which 763 United Methodists and other members of the Methodist and Wesleyan traditions are involved.
764 There is strong agreement among the churches on other key points concerning authority and 765 leadership in the church, for example, that virtually all churches include in their structure some 766 provision for a ministry of general oversight (episcopé, literally “oversight” or “supervision”), 767 and that all ministerial leadership in the church is to be exercised “in a personal, collegial, and

---

<sup>39</sup> BEM, Ministry section, §25 (p. 25).

768 communal way.”<sup>40</sup> Further exploration of the character of leadership in the church may lead to 769 new understandings of its form, not presently envisioned.

770         In The United Methodist Church, although we have deacons, elders (presbyters), and 771 bishops, we do not have a “threefold ministry” in the sense in which that term is used in other 772 traditions or in the ecumenical discussion. We ordain deacons and elders; we do not ordain 773 bishops, who are elected from among the elders to exercise a special supervisory role.<sup>41</sup> Further, 774 we do not at present practice “sequential ordination,” in which a person to be ordained as an 775 elder must first be ordained as a deacon. In the early years of The United Methodist Church, as 776 in The Methodist Church prior to the union, sequential ordination was the practice: the ordained 777 diaconate was conceived as a step toward ordination as elder, roughly coinciding with one’s 778 probationary membership in an annual conference. An elder was given “full authority for the 779 ministry of Word, Sacrament, and Order,”<sup>42</sup> and there was no separate parallel formulation for 780 the ministry of the deacon, which was seen essentially as a involving a limited authority to 781 participate in the same activities.

782         The idea of a “permanent diaconate,” that is, of deacons who would be ordained to that 783 office not as a stage on the way to ordination as elders but rather in order to exercise a distinctive 784 regular ministry as deacons, was gaining traction in a number of churches already at the time The 785 United Methodist Church was formed. (“Permanent deacon” and “transitional deacon,” though 786 common terms in this discussion, are technically misnomers, since in a pattern of sequential

---

<sup>40</sup> BEM, section on Ministry, §26 (pp. 25-26). The language is echoed in Towards a Common Vision, 52 (p. 29).

<sup>41</sup> Book of Discipline 2012, ¶402 (p. 315).

<sup>42</sup> Book of Discipline 1968, ¶313 (p. 110).

787 ordination elders do not cease being deacons.) A permanent diaconate, open to married as well
788 as single men (but, like the priesthood, open only to men) was authorized by the Second Vatican 789 Council and introduced in different parts of the Roman Catholic Church in the following decade.
790 The Anglican Communion and several other church bodies established a permanent or 791 “vocational” diaconate around the same time. After a number of experiments over the years 792 (including the unordained office of Diaconal Minister), The United Methodist Church 793 established a permanent ordained diaconate in 1996, and at the same time abolished the practice 794 of sequential ordination. In our current polity, prospective deacons and prospective elders are on 795 separate “tracks,” and the language indicating the character of the ministry to which each is 796 ordained—in the case of a deacon, a ministry of “Word, Service, Justice, and Compassion,” and 797 in the case of an elder, a ministry of “Word, Sacrament, Order, and Service”—is intended to 798 indicate that although there may be common areas of responsibility there are also distinct areas 799 in each that the other does not share.<sup>43</sup>

800         Because this structure for the ordering of ministry is relatively new—as is the 801 accompanying innovation establishing an “Order” of Deacons and an “Order” of Elders as 802 collegial bodies composed of all those ordained to those respective offices—how these 803 arrangements will fare in the long run remains to be seen. The picture is complicated by the fact 804 that United Methodism also features a number of recognized ministerial offices and roles that do 805 not require ordination, some of which involve the principal activities normally associated with 806 the ordained offices—a situation that gives rise to much perplexity both within and beyond the

---

<sup>43</sup> Book of Discipline 2012, ¶¶329.1 (p. 332). How effectively the wording indicates such a distinction is open to question.

807 church.<sup>44</sup> Further reflection upon the ecumenical discussion, and continued consultation with a 808 wide range of our ecumenical partners, will be vital to any responsible progress on these 809 seemingly perennial issues. We have significant insight and testimony from our own experience 810 to offer in the ecumenical forum, such as that coming from our readiness to adapt to new 811 situations and our firm and irrevocable commitment to the full participation of women in 812 ministerial leadership in all its forms. But there can be no doubt that we also have things to learn 813 from the experience of others. We may find, among other things, that a reaffirmation and 814 exploration of the triadic pattern of “Word, Sacrament, and Order” in the development of a fuller 815 constructive theology of ministry would have advantages both ecumenically and in the life of our 816 own community.

817

818 III. Vision and Practice

819

820 In this concluding section, we are taking under more direct consideration three questions 821 that were raised in our opening pages and have been accompanying us at least in the background 822 all along.

823 First, how might we characterize the particular role of The United Methodist Church 824 within the “Church Universal”? What is its niche in the ecclesial ecology? Second, what 825 insights might our participation in the ecumenical discussion generate to help us deal more 826 constructively and effectively with the vexing issues surrounding “legitimate diversity,” both as 827 they affect our own life and mission in The United Methodist Church and in our ongoing

---

<sup>44</sup> On this whole subject, see Book of Discipline 2012, ¶¶266-370, John E. Harnish, The Orders of Ministry in The United Methodist Church (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2000), and Thomas Edward Frank, Polity, Practice, and the Mission of The United Methodist Church (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2006), chapter 7.

828 relations with other Christian communities? Third, how might a renewed ecclesial vision inform 829 our deliberations about our polity—that is, about how we structure our common life in the 830 service of our mission?

831

832 United Methodism and the Church Universal

833         There are dangers in any attempt to place ourselves in relation to other churches, or to 834 describe our own distinctiveness. We may overestimate our distinctiveness, especially if we 835 regard the distinctive features as advantages or virtues. We may overestimate the extent to which 836 the distinctive characteristics we claim are actually to be found among us. The image we have of 837 ourselves may bear little resemblance to what others might tell us about ourselves. “To see 838 ourselves as others see us,” H. Richard Niebuhr remarked, “or to have others communicate to us 839 what they see when they regard our lives from the outside is to have a moral experience.”<sup>45</sup> At 840 considerable risk, then, we will suggest three main elements, out of many that might be 841 mentioned, that may be markers of United Methodist identity.<sup>46</sup> They are, at the least, 842 aspirational features: things that—judging from the importance we assign to them in principle—843 we would like to be known by. They are marks that we profess to value. Although all three are 844 certainly rooted in our common heritage with other Wesleyan and Methodist communities—that 845 is, in those distinctive convictions of this heritage that were mentioned at the beginning of this 846 paper— they represent the character of United Methodism as a particular ecclesial form and

---

<sup>45</sup> H. Richard Niebuhr, The Meaning of Revelation (New York: Macmillan, 1960), p. 62.

<sup>46</sup> For a rich and thoughtful treatment of characteristic features of the Methodist traditions more generally, related in an imaginative way to the “four notes” of the Nicene Creed, see Russell E. Richey (with Dennis M. Campbell and William B. Lawrence), Marks of Methodism: Theology in Ecclesial Practice (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2005).

847 expression of that common heritage. Their prominence in United Methodist discourse makes 848 them a good starting point for our reflection.

849         One of these features has to do with the scope of grace, in two senses. These senses 850 correspond, in a way, with the first two of those three distinctive convictions of our heritage.
851 One sense is our Wesleyan conviction—by no means exclusive to Wesleyans, but definitely 852 claimed by this tradition—that God’s love extends to all of God’s creatures, and not just to some.
853 The line from 1 Timothy 2:4 cited previously could be a United Methodist motto: The God
854 revealed in Christ “desires everyone to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth.”
855 God’s grace is available to all, in equal measure. Among other things, this accounts for the 856 emphasis placed in The United Methodist Church upon full inclusivity in membership and 857 ministry, so that the church might be a faithful sign of the scope of God’s grace. Needless to say, 858 our practice has sometimes fallen short of our aspirations.

859         The second sense in which the scope of grace is a distinctive theme has to do not with its 860 extent or reach, but with its aim or effect. It is the affirmation that as God’s grace is received in 861 the freedom that it creates, it is transformative. It leads, as Wesley said, to a “real change” 862 within the recipient. “If anyone is in Christ, there is a new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17). Being born 863 anew, receiving faith “filled with the energy of love” (as Wesley would render Galatians 5:6), 864 having “God’s love . . . poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit” (Romans 5:5)—these 865 were for the early Methodists, and have been for their spiritual descendants, vivid experiential 866 realities, leading to new personal and social consequences as that love is absorbed in personal 867 renewal and expressed not only in direct and explicit witness to the Gospel but also in 868 community-building (koinonia activity, we might say) in a great variety of ways, from personal 869 relationships to the founding of hospitals and universities, from the outreach ministries of local 870 congregations to participation in large-scale efforts for social amelioration and reform. The 871 impetus in the United Methodist heritage, as stated, for example, in many paragraphs of the 872 Social Principles and in occasional resolutions of the General Conference, is to create and 873 support institutions and practices that (in our admittedly limited judgment at any particular time) 874 foster human well-being, and to challenge those that do not.

875         In one of John Wesley’s own short descriptions of the scope of God’s grace in this 876 second sense, he wrote:

877         By salvation I mean, not barely (according to the vulgar notion) deliverance from 878 hell, or going to heaven; but a present deliverance from sin, a restoration of the 879 soul to its primitive health, its original purity; a recovery of the divine nature; the 880 renewal of our souls after the image of God in righteousness and true holiness, in 881 justice, mercy, and truth. This implies all holy and heavenly tempers, and by 882 consequence all holiness of conversation.<sup>47</sup>

883 United Methodism aims to embrace the entire range of this concern. At times the inward 884 cleansing and renewal of the heart is emphasized, and at times it is the effort to work out what 885 many have taken to be the broader implications of “holiness of conversation”—the promotion of 886 “justice, mercy, and truth” throughout the social order—that receives more attention. Such 887 differences of emphasis are appropriate when geared to the needs of the particular situations in

---

<sup>47</sup> John Wesley, A Farther Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion, Part I (1745), in The Appeals to Men of Reason and Religion and Certain Related Open Letters, edited by Gerald R. Cragg, The Works of John Wesley, volume 11 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976), p 106. “Conversation” in Wesley’s time and usage meant something like “social interaction,” one’s conduct toward and relationships with others.

888 which we find ourselves. But we are at our best when we realize the close relationship between 889 the two, and at something less than our best when we play them off against each other.

890         A second marker of United Methodist identity—related to the third distinctive conviction 891 of our heritage, dealing with the community-forming intent of the love of God—goes by the 892 name of “connectionalism.” “Conciliarity” is a related (though not synonymous) term in the 893 ecumenical discussion, and other aspects of the treatment of the topics of order and authority in 894 Towards a Common Vision draw attention to things we United Methodists might associate with 895 connectionalism. Our “itinerant” ministry, the superintendency (bishops and district 896 superintendents), and the system of conferences are intended as instruments of connectionalism.
897 All three are intended to foster an ethos and practice of mutual support and mutual 898 accountability, of shared oversight (here, it is pertinent to note that one sense of episcopé 899 mentioned in Towards a Common Vision is “coordination”), and of the strengthening of all by 900 the gifts of all. It is always an open question how well our current structures and polity actually 901 serve the connectional relationship and way of working that we seek, and each of the three 902 elements just mentioned are currently under some scrutiny in that regard. The underlying 903 principle, however, connects us with some of the deepest insights of ancient Christian tradition 904 regarding the sustaining of communion in and among Christian communities.

905         The ongoing debates in our church about the proper shape and expression of our 906 connectional structure and polity are often denounced as unseemly exercises in political 907 maneuvering and power mongering. While too often on the mark, such criticism obscures a 908 deeper struggle. If, as noted earlier, connectionalism and mission are inextricably linked, then at 909 stake in these debates is nothing less than the vitality of our distinctive connectional form of 910 church as an aspiring global body.

911           The third mark of United Methodist identity to be offered is closely related to the first 912 two, and might be seen as an implication of them. It is a commitment to theological reflection as 913 the task of the whole church. The presence in the Book of Discipline not only of doctrinal 914 standards, but also of a statement on “our theological task,” indicates the importance of this 915 commitment. Note that theological reflection does not replace standards of doctrine; we need 916 and affirm both.

917           The theological task, though related to the Church’s doctrinal expressions, 918 serves a different function. Our doctrinal affirmations assist us in the discernment 919 of Christian truth in ever-changing contexts. Our theological task includes the 920 testing, renewal, elaboration, and application of our doctrinal perspective in 921 carrying out our calling “to spread scriptural holiness over these lands.”<sup>48</sup>

922 By their very character and content, our doctrinal standards not only permit but require the sort 923 of responsible, thoughtful critical engagement that “Our Theological Task” describes. Our 924 theological work must be “both critical and constructive,” “both individual and communal,” 925 “contextual and incarnational,” and “essentially practical.”<sup>49</sup> To have given such attention and 926 affirmation to the church’s ongoing theological task is truly a hallmark of The United Methodist 927 Church. It will stand us in good stead as we seek to embody our connectional covenant with 928 theological creativity, flexibility, and dexterity in increasingly diverse contexts around the world.
929 As with the first two features mentioned, it is an area in which our principled commitments serve 930 both to judge and to guide our practice.

---

<sup>48</sup> Book of Discipline 2012, ¶105 (p. 78).

<sup>49</sup> Book of Discipline 2012, ¶105 (pp. 79-80).

931

932

Diversity and Conflict

933

934

These three features, taken together, and enriched by ecumenical wisdom, might point toward a way to address our current difficulties over conflict in the church.

935

936

937

938

939

940

941

942

943

944

945

946

It should be said that our problem is not conflict. Our problem is in the way we sometimes deal with conflict. We would do well to remember at the outset that conflict is a “given” in the church. It is to be expected. Disagreements creating conflict may arise over (to use the Wesleyan language) “what to teach, how to teach, and what to do.”<sup>50</sup> Embedded in and accompanying these disagreements may be other, sometimes hidden or unacknowledged, difficulties also leading to tensions: antagonisms stemming from the complex histories and relationships of the persons and groups involved, differences over political or cultural values, struggles over the possession and uses of power, and so forth. Different sources and varieties of conflict may be interrelated in any given instance. Given the variety of the human uses of the church, it sometimes happens that conflict over one issue is promoted or exploited by individuals or groups as a means of accomplishing some other aim, or in order to satisfy other needs. Conflict is as complex as it is common.<sup>51</sup>

---

<sup>50</sup>This frequently-quoted formula stems from the agenda and minutes of the first Methodist conference in London in 1744: “After some time spent in prayer, the design of our meeting was proposed, namely to consider: (1) What to teach, (2) How to teach, and (3) What to do, how to regulate our doctrine, discipline, and practice.” (From Wesley’s first published version of the minutes, dated 1749, in The Methodist Societies: The Minutes of Conference, edited by Henry D. Rack, The Works of John Wesley, volume 10 [Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2011], p. 778.)

<sup>51</sup>A useful brief definition of conflict is this one offered by the Danish Centre for Conflict Resolution: “Conflicts are disagreements that lead to tension within, and between, people.” Bjarne Vestergaard, Erik Helvard and Aase Rieck Sørensen, Conflict Resolution—Working with Conflicts (Frederiksberg, Denmark: Danish Centre for Conflict Resolution, 2010), p. 1, available at http://lnu.se/polopoly\_fs/1.105781!2011%20DCCR\_BASIC%20MATERIAL.pdf.

947           A church without conflict is very likely to be a church that is failing to be the church.
948 Recall that it is God who brings us to the church, or who brings the church to us, creating church 949 in our midst by the power of the Holy Spirit. We are brought together in the first instance by 950 grace, and not because we share the same views, customs, cultural practices, or even moral 951 values. (Again, keeping in mind the human uses of the church, we might say that to the extent 952 that we come together because we share the same views, values, social standing, and so forth, we 953 may not be realizing the more radical gift of koinonia in the Spirit.) Through our encounters 954 with others in Christian community, we may of course come to share a good deal, gradually.
955 Minds may be changed—perhaps most productively when it is not a case of one party winning 956 an argument over others, but rather of their being led through their experience together to a 957 greater understanding than any of them previously possessed. We may discover or come to 958 agreement on a number of things. But overcoming or erasing differences is not necessarily the 959 best outcome. Some differences are part of the good diversity of creation, the diversity that is “a 960 gift from the Lord” and should be honored as such.

961           Furthermore, some differences within the church aid the church in its mission to a diverse 962 world. At present, the churches are faced with situations they have never faced before. New 963 technologies give rise to previously unimagined possibilities; new knowledge changes our 964 understanding of ourselves and of the world in which we live. When the church is confronted 965 with a new situation and is pondering its best response, it is well to have a wide range of 966 experience and perspectives at hand. To understand and respect one another’s differences and 967 the ways in which they contribute to the church’s fulfillment of its mission is itself a mode of 968 sharing, and something like the ecumenical pattern of “convergence,” in which differences are

969 held in the midst of a deeper and richer unity, is a hoped-for experience also among members of 970 a local congregation or other form of ekklesia as well.

971         In such cases, differences do not threaten the unity God intends, but instead enhance it.
972 At the same time, some of our more serious conflict is generated by differing responses to these 973 developments, as we are “striving to express faithfully the witness we make in our own time.”
974 There are instances of conflict in which different people have incompatible or opposing 975 judgments on some matter that they take to be vital to the church’s own identity and mission, and 976 in which a resolution seems beyond our capability. When a conflict can be resolved through 977 discussion or negotiation, through a process in which all involved are treated with respect, the 978 whole event can be a powerful witness to the gospel. As the church, we are not called to avoid 979 conflict, nor to banish it, but rather to deal with it redemptively.

980         When a resolution does not seem possible, what are our options?

981         An earlier ecumenical statement, informing the understanding expressed in Towards a 982 Common Vision, affirms: “The purpose of the church is to unite people with Christ in the power 983 of the Spirit, to manifest communion in prayer and action and thus to point to the fullness of 984 communion with God, humanity and the whole creation in the glory of the kingdom.”<sup>52</sup> Perhaps 985 in this light we should not move too readily toward a democratic resolution of our deeper 986 differences, at least as that is commonly understood.

987         One important consideration in this connection is that we may not yet be in a position to 988 render a responsible judgment on the matter at hand. We may not know all that we need to 989 know. We may not have adequate conceptual resources. We may not have the spiritual maturity

---

<sup>52</sup> “The Unity of the Church as Koinonia, Gift and Calling,” Seventh Assembly of the World Council of Churches, Canberra, 1991, in The Ecumenical Movement: An Anthology of Key Texts and Voices, edited by Michael Kinnamon and Brian E. Cope (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1996), p. 124.

990 to see what we need to see. We may not even have posed our questions rightly. We may, in 991 short, need to gain some intellectual and emotional humility, and to cultivate some dispositions 992 that would permit wisdom to grow.

993 Features of our United Methodist heritage might encourage us to ponder this possibility.
 994 In John Wesley's sermon, "Catholic Spirit," we find this sober acknowledgement:

995 It is an unavoidable consequence of the present weakness and shortness of human 996 understanding that several men will be of several minds, in religion as well as in 997 common life. So it has been from the beginning of the world, and so it will be 'till 998 the restitution of all things.'

999 Nay farther: although every man necessarily believes that every particular 1000 opinion which he holds is true (for to believe any opinion is not true is the same 1001 thing as not to hold it) yet can no man be assured that all his own opinions taken 1002 together are true. Nay, every thinking man is assured they are not, seeing 1003 humanum est errare et nescire—to be ignorant of many things, and to mistake in 1004 some, is the necessary condition of humanity. This therefore, he is sensible, is his 1005 own case. He knows in the general that he himself is mistaken; although in what 1006 particulars he mistakes he does not, perhaps cannot, know.<sup>53</sup>

1007 We can be sure that we are mistaken in some of what we think we know. What contribution 1008 might this awareness make to our approach to a situation of conflict?

1009 Another passage from John Wesley's writings offers further insight on this score. It is in 1010 the Preface to his "standard sermons":

---

<sup>53</sup> John Wesley, "Catholic Spirit," Sermons II, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 2 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1985), pp.83-84.

1011 9. Are you persuaded you see more clearly than me? It is not unlikely that you 1012 may. Then treat me as you would desire to be treated yourself upon a change of 1013 circumstances. Point me out a better way than I have yet known. Show me it is so 1014 by plain proof of Scripture. And if I linger in the path I have been accustomed to 1015 tread, and am therefore unwilling to leave, labour with me a little, take me by the 1016 hand, and lead me as I am able to bear. But be not displeased if I entreat you not 1017 to beat me down in order to quicken my pace. I can go but feebly and slowly at 1018 best—then, I should not be able to go at all. May I not request of you, farther, not 1019 to give me hard names in order to bring me into the right way? Suppose I was 1020 ever so much in the wrong, I doubt this would not set me right. Rather it would 1021 make me run so much the farther from you—and so get more and more out of the 1022 way.

1023 10. Nay, perhaps, if you are angry so shall I be too, and then there will be small 1024 hopes of finding the truth. If once anger arise, eute kapnos (as Homer somewhere 1025 expresses it), this smoke will so dim the eyes of my soul that I shall be able to see 1026 nothing clearly. For God's sake, if it be possible to avoid it let us not provoke one 1027 another to wrath. Let us not kindle in each other this fire of hell, much less blow it 1028 up into a flame. If we could discern truth by that dreadful light, would it not be 1029 loss rather than gain? For how far is love, even with many wrong opinions, to be 1030 preferred before truth itself without love? We may die without the knowledge of 1031 many truths and yet be carried into Abraham's bosom. But if we die without love, 1032 what will knowledge avail? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels!

1033           The God of love forbid we should ever make the trial! May he prepare us for the 1034           knowledge of all truth, by filling our hearts with all his love, and with all joy and 1035           peace in believing.<sup>54</sup>

1036           What does such a plea require of us, or offer to us, when it comes to our handling of 1037           conflict?

1038           Wesley is speaking here of the sort of situation in which we may become vulnerable to a 1039           spirit of fear, and thus of hostility and divisiveness; a spirit destructive of the communion that is 1040           God's will for us. In the grip of such a spirit, we tend to seek certainty and safety by separating 1041           ourselves from the apparent sources of our uneasiness. Rather than move toward them in the 1042           hope of understanding and of being understood, we move away, and construct an image of them
1043           that will justify our rejection of them. And we attempt to rally others to our cause. We may use 1044           a rhetoric of polarization in this attempt: if we can persuade others that there are two (and only 1045           two) "sides," diametrically opposed and irreconcilable, and if we can succeed in depicting these 1046           two sides in such a way that only one of them represents truth, justice, and morality, then we are 1047           well on our way to causing the separation which (we vainly hope) will give us peace.

1048           In face of this temptation to yield to fear and hostility, one thing we may do to resist it is 1049           not to succumb to the familiar rhetoric of polarization, but to recognize it (whether in our own 1050           discourse, or in that of others), to refuse it, and to counter it constructively. But undergirding 1051           whatever we do should be an abiding confidence that God's intention is to gather up all things 1052           together in Christ (Ephesians 1:10), and an earnest prayer not to stand in the way of the 1053           fulfillment of that intention.

---

<sup>54</sup> John Wesley, "The Preface" to Sermons on Several Occasions, volume 1 (1746), in Sermons I, edited by Albert C. Outler, The Works of John Wesley, volume 1 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1984), p. 107. The Greek for "like a puff of smoke" has been transliterated here.

1054

1055

Ecclesial Vision and Polity

1056

1057

1058

1059

1060

1061

Theologically speaking, a church's polity is an aspect of "order," in the triad "Word, Sacrament, and Order" discussed earlier. It has to do with the way the church orders its own life responsibly so as to fulfill its calling. Order, as embodied and lived out in our polity as well as in all its other forms, is inseparable from Word and Sacrament: it is guided (and judged) by the living Word, and it is sustained and continually renewed by the grace of God's sacramental presence.

1062

1063

1064

1065

1066

The way the church orders its own life is itself an aspect of its witness to the world. When its polity enables and manifests an openness to the community-forming power of the Holy Spirit, when it serves the church's mandate "to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Ephesians 4:3) with such power and clarity as to bring to humankind a new understanding of the possibilities for fruitful life together, then it has fulfilled its purpose.

1067

1068

1069

In this, as in much else, it is probably safe to say that we in The United Methodist Church have not yet arrived at the goal (cf. Philippians 3:12). There are, however, resources within our own tradition that might bring us closer to that goal, if we were to make wise use of them.

1070

1071

1072

1073

In a study published in 1998, two political scientists observed that, because of its broad socio-economic and cultural makeup, United Methodism in the United States often tends to mirror the range of values and stances on issues of its surrounding society, rather than offering a clear and unified witness to that society.<sup>55</sup> But they noted that this same breadth of

---

<sup>55</sup> John C. Green and James L. Guth, "United Methodists and American Culture: A Statistical Portrait," The People(s) Called Methodist: Forms and Reforms of Their Life, edited by William B. Lawrence, Dennis M. Campbell, and Russell E. Richey (Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon Press, 1998), pp. 27-52. See especially the introduction and conclusion of the essay, pp. 27-28 and 49-50, from which the quotations here have been taken.

1074 representation of differing views on matters of common concern also gives United Methodism a 1075 “potential to both contain diverse social stands and knit together gaps within the social fabric,” 1076 and ventured to suggest that the exercise of this potential might constitute this church’s 1077 “distinctive contribution” to public life. They went on to propose that the realization of this 1078 promise would require the church to improve its “policy-making procedures,” so as “to 1079 encourage the development of genuine agreement rather than simply the expression of competing 1080 points of view. . . . Methodists must realize that consensus does not emerge from diversity by 1081 magic, and that it requires great institutional and personal commitment to achieve.”

1082         These political scientists’ observations and suggestions express, in non-theological 1083 language, some important features of the situation we are in and the task before us as a church in 1084 the realm of polity. The substantial growth and diversification of The United Methodist Church 1085 across the world since the publication of their study only makes the situation and the task more 1086 urgent and compelling.

1087         The preceding section, on “diversity and conflict,” offered a sampling of some of the 1088 Wesleyan resources available to us that have to do with the sort of intellectual, emotional, and 1089 spiritual maturity that we need if we are to be properly disposed toward the issues that we face 1090 and toward one another as we face them. Much more could be said, and needs to be said, in that 1091 connection, but the relevance of these resources to questions of polity is clear. We need forms of 1092 polity that are consistent with our core convictions: that is, forms that honor the radically
1093 inclusive scope of God’s saving grace, forms that recognize and build upon the transformative 1094 character of that grace, and forms that will serve, rather than subvert, the growth of genuine 1095 community. In that regard, a specifically polity-related Wesleyan concept deserves further 1096 attention: the concept of Christian conference.

1097           “Conference,” in this usage, refers first of all neither to a meeting nor to those involved in 1098 such a meeting—the two senses that may appear to us most obvious in United Methodist usage
1099 today—but rather to a practice that Christians are to be engaged in. In one instance,<sup>56</sup> John 1100 Wesley referred to Christian conference as an “instituted means of grace,” that is, as a practice 1101 incumbent upon Christians and meant to foster our growth in “holiness of heart and life.” It is 1102 one of the ways God helps us to help one another toward maturity in faith, hope, and love. It 1103 involves elements of prayerful, honest self-examination, of “speaking the truth in love” to one 1104 another, of mutual accountability and support, and of careful deliberation as to how we are to 1105 conduct ourselves in the future. The practice of Christian conference goes on under many forms, 1106 including one-on-one conversations between Christians, small group meetings of various kinds 1107 and for various purposes, and even larger events such as those gatherings officially designated 1108 as “Conferences” in United Methodist parlance. Ideally, the practice of Christian conference is to 1109 some degree an aspect of virtually every encounter in the church, though in its more thorough 1110 and intense forms it is best conducted within a more limited range of well-thought-out
1111 circumstances and venues. As the minutes testify, Wesley’s relatively small regular conferences 1112 with his preachers included strong elements of the practice, although its normal structured 1113 settings within the early Methodist movement were the meetings of “classes” and “bands” within 1114 the local Methodist societies. Much the same might be said of the situation in early North 1115 American Methodism.

---

<sup>56</sup>See the “Large Minutes” of 1763, in The Methodist Societies: The Minutes of Conference, edited by Henry D. Rack, The Works of John Wesley, volume 10 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2011), pp. 855-858. The 1782 hymn by John Fawcett, “Blest Be the Tie That Binds” (UMH 557) expresses some of what “conference” is about, for example, “We share each other’s woes, our mutual burdens bear . . . .”

1116           How we might better avail ourselves of this means of grace in the church of the twenty-1117 first century, and particularly in our deliberations around polity, is an open question, and one that 1118 deserves serious consideration.

1119

1120           The church is a gift of the Triune God. It is also a very human community and 1121 institution. Both aspects of its reality need to be kept firmly in mind in all of our deliberations 1122 and actions. We give thanks for the Church Universal, and for The United Methodist Church as 1123 a particular part of that body with its own calling to fulfill as a sign and servant of God's saving 1124 love for humankind, witnessing to and fostering the life of wonder, love, and praise that is the 1125 proper vocation of every human being. But we also do well to remember that "we have this 1126 treasure in earthen vessels."

1127           For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our 1128 hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus 1129 Christ. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the 1130 power may be of God, and not of us.<sup>57</sup>

1131

1132

---

<sup>57</sup> 2 Cor 4:6-7 KJV.